number of the members, the argument being as to whether or not it was advisable to make collections by means of societies and the efforts of the ladies. Those opposed to the society system thought that it lessened the amount of collections taken by the ministers, so that when they reported to Conference they had very little to show for their work and but meagre evidences of the prosperity of the work and the liberality of the people of their respective districts.

A resolution was offered requiring the secretaries of societies to report to Conference at its annual sessions showing the amounts raised for missionary purposes during the year by the members of the societies.
